Human Resource Development Review

An Official Journal of the Academy of Human Resource Development

Editor: Richard J. Torraco, University of Nebraska-Lincoln
Associate Editor: Lyle Yorks, Teachers College, Columbia University

The journal provides new theoretical insights that advance understanding of human resource development including:

- Syntheses of existing bodies of theory
- New substantive theories
- Exploratory conceptual models
- Taxonomies and typologies developed as foundations for theory
- Papers on theory building and theory building methods
- Papers on the history of theory
- Critique of theory that includes alternative research propositions
- Metatheory
- Integrative literature reviews with strong theoretical implications

Relevant to both scholars and practitioners, articles in HRDR include comprehensive reviews on the foundations of human resource development. These reviews cover such issues as

- Philosophies of HRD
- Historical foundations
- Definitions of HRD
- Conceptual organization of the field
- Ethical foundations

Submissions are encouraged that provide new theoretical insights that can advance our understanding of human resource development. HRDR takes a multi-paradigm view of theory and theory building so submissions from different paradigms are encouraged. Papers whose central focus is empirical findings, including empirical validation of theory, and papers that focus on problems of empirical method and design are not considered for publication in HRDR.
