For over 35 years, Community College Review (CCR) has been a leading journal for the publication of scholarly, peer-reviewed research and commentary on community colleges. CCR welcomes manuscripts dealing with all aspects of community college administration, education, and policy, both within the American higher education system and the higher education systems of other countries with similar tertiary institutions. The journal publishes manuscripts that describe original qualitative or quantitative research that involves community colleges, as well as scholarly essays that draw on the literature to advance our understanding of community colleges.

Community College Review (CCR) is a refereed journal. Its editorial staff relies on the advice of an editorial board composed of community college educators and scholars. The staff reviews all submissions and assigns manuscripts to at least two reviewers for evaluation. Reviewers include members of the editorial board and scholars who have a background in the topic addressed by the manuscript.
