The articles included in this special issue are revised versions of papers presented at a workshop on desistance held in Washington, DC, on May 3-4, 2006. The workshop was funded by the National Consortium on Violence Research (NCOVR). The workshop was organized by the co-editors of this special issue and attended by the authors of the articles. The special issue is aimed to convince readers of the crucial importance of the topic of desistance in criminology, from both theoretical and policy viewpoints, and of the need to develop this area of research further in order to address essential questions about this key dimension of the criminal career.

Table of Contents

Editorial
Lila Kazemian and David P. Farrington

Desistance From Crime: Theoretical, Empirical, Methodological, and Policy Considerations
Lila Kazemian

The Effect of Criminal History Variables on the Process of Desistance in Adulthood Among Serious Youthful Offenders
Michael E. Ezell

Behavioral, Self, and Social Control Predictors of Desistance From Crime: A Test of Launch and Contemporaneous Effect Models
Julien Morizot and Marc LeBlanc

Self-Control and Criminal Career Dimensions
Alex R. Piquero, Terrie E. Moffitt, and Bradley E. Wright

Subjective Desistance and the Transition to Adulthood
Michael Massoglia and Christopher Uggen

Amputation or Reconstruction? Notes on the Concept of “Knifing Off” and Desistance From Crime
Shadd Maruna and Kevin Roy

Advancing Knowledge About Desistance
David P. Farrington