EDITOR: W. Richard Cowling III, RN, PhD, APRN-BC
University of North Carolina, Greensboro

The Journal of Holistic Nursing (JHN) is a peer-reviewed journal, publishing articles for more than 20 years that contribute to the development of knowledge regarding holism and holistic health and nursing with an emphasis on research, practice, education, and aesthetics. Through its objective forum, JHN allows caring and innovative nurses in clinical practice, research, individual wellness practice, and academia to exchange critical information, share clinical experiences, and communicate research and theory development, its practical applications, clinical case studies and aesthetic artistic expressions of holistic knowledge.

Published four times a year, JHN seeks manuscripts from practitioners, researchers, educators, administrators, and artists in the field of holistic health and nursing. JHN provides a venue for sharing important work that challenges current thinking, expands horizons, and contributes to the optimum health of those we serve. We are interested in a wide range of topics that advance the science and practice of holistic health. Recent topics have dealt with:

- developing innovative practice strategies
- research on alternative and complementary interventions
- critical reviews of literature on holistic topics
- concept and theory development relevant to holistic health
- advancing ethical understandings of health care decisions
- creative approaches and methods to holistic research
- application of holistic principles to various age populations
- descriptions and explanations of the role of spirituality in health
- use of holistic approaches in dealing with current societal issues such as disaster relief

The editorial staff is committed to considering a variety of work that expresses the potential of holistic science and practice and uses multiple ways of knowing and understanding phenomena from a holistic perspective.
