The Journal of Disability Policy Studies (JDPS) addresses compelling, variable issues in ethics, policy, and law related to individuals with disabilities. A major focus is quantitative and qualitative policy research. Articles have implications in fields such as education, law, sociology, public health, family studies, medicine, social work, and public administration. Occasional special series discuss current problems or areas needing more in-depth research, for example, disability and aging, policy concerning families of children with disabilities, oppression and disability, school violence policies and interventions, and systems change in supporting individuals with disabilities.

Submissions are judged by the social significance of the problem and adherence to accepted research practices and standards. The contribution to theory and knowledge and the use of appropriate method are more important than any particular methodology. The following types of articles are considered for publication:

- Brief reports
- Discussion articles
- Research
- Review articles
- Policy Forum
- Comments
